How Couples Counseling Can Help Your Relationship by Camilla Devreut

With the high rate of divorce and break ups in our society today, couples counseling is highly needed to help partners work out relationships instead of ending them. It is heartbreaking for many people who invest time in a relationship to give up due to some challenging issues that they cannot work through. Couples counseling focuses on helping couples learn how to deal with their problems and learn how to better communicate with each other. Many couples shy away from getting help due to ignorance, pride, or lack of finances to afford it, but the truth is that couples counseling has had wonderful results.

Relationships normally start out wonderful but over time the fire can dwindle and each partner can begin to drift, get resentful, repetitive arguments can occur, and a feeling of boredom or emptiness ensues. With couples counseling, research tells us that about 75% of couples that go to counseling feel like their relationship has improved and about 65% state that a â€œsignificantâ€• improvement occurs This is quite a big percentage!

Couples counseling is meant to give partners valuable tools and resources to make positive changes individually and together. Many times a couple experiences dissatisfaction and decides to end the relationship instead of probing to find out the root cause. If the root cause or causes are found and dealt with, the relationship can turn around, but if no one takes the time to find out, the relationship is likely to fail.

Couples counselors will help facilitate open and honest communication between partners. Communication is a vital element in a relationship so learning how to effectively tell what is on oneâ€™s mind is essential to success. For example, if a partner is angry and resentful because her partner does not spend enough time with her, but she never tells her partner this, she does not give him the chance to change this. He may have no idea that he is neglecting time with her or that she requires more time than he is aware of.

Relationships require a great deal of work. Couples counselors can give you the tools you need to work on your relationship. They will help you see what is wrong and assist you in coming up with possible solutions. They can give insight into underlying negative patterns in the relationship and encourage change there. Your counselor will act as your guide and facilitator of a successful relationship.

If you are in a relationship and it is struggling or if you are ready to throw in the towel, consider seeing a couples counselor. Sometimes a relationship simply needs a professional to help each partner through some issues. If there is love there, the relationship is salvageable. Look for a trained coupleâ€™s counselor that has a good reputation.
