Article Side

A Tutorial Guide for Writing your Dissertation Proposal by Kelly Black

Article published on March 22nd 2012 | College

Did you leave your dissertation proposal to the last minute since itâ€™s only worth 10% of the overall score and now you do not have the time to write it?

Have you just submitted the dissertation proposal according to the feedback of your supervisor but to no avail as he has rejected it once again without any feedback this time?

You have made couple of research reports and assignment all your life but now the time has come to work on your final major project i.e. dissertation. You have looked up for proposal examples but every time you find a sample that contains only the name of the sections that are to be included in the proposal. Now you are in dire need of a set of profound guidelines that will assist you to get your dissertation proposal approved in the first attempt.

Read out the following 5 sections to design a proposal that will surely be approved and will advance you further towards your degree.

1.Introduction

The introduction of the dissertation proposals address the foremost topics related to your topic. It will give an account of those questions in the light of that particular framework. The introduction aims to give a context to the generalized concepts and issues so that the reader is able to discern your research purpose

2.Problem Statement

The problem statement section will take up greater details and will provide an in depth background to the specific context of the problem and will also relate it to the particular academic field. This section is built up in accordance to the introduction also highlights the rationale, significance as well as the need of the study.

3.Conceptual Framework

It defines the terminologies, but in the specific context, that will be used in your dissertation. It models around your thinking and entails the theoretical structure. It identifies key constructs, their usage and the researcherâ€™s standpoint on those terminologies.

It is always recommended to first explain the general meaning of those terms and then the framework in which you are going to use it

4.Methodology

In the fourth section, the researcher discusses his methods of conducting and progressing of the research as well as will also provide valid reasons for the particular choice. It establishes sound ground for how a particular method will answer the research problem.

Overall, the methodology chapter covers the research design, its justification, limitations and the results that the researcher expect from this study.

5.Bibliography

It is a list of work that has been viewed for that particular study. It is a catalogue that provides citation to the materials sought to gather information. Give an order to this list and apply a proper format applicable according to your academic field.

A properly written dissertation proposal that includes a sound content will definitely be approved for its compilation and wholeness. It will be easier for the student to communicate his viewpoint over the subject through a strong proposal.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/college-articles/a-tutorial-guide-for-writing-your-dissertation-proposal.htm
- Article Side

Kelly Black - About Author:
Kelly Black is a senior research writer and provides help for a dissertation proposal and a dissertation proposals.Feel free to contact for any sort of help in this regard.

Article Keywords:
dissertation proposal, dissertation proposals

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!