Electric Fence Energisers by Julia Roger

Article published on January 16th 2012 | Business

Electric fence energisers are vital components in the activities of those involved in animal husbandry as well as other industries. As you can guess, they are the means of supplying electric fences with power and are therefore the reason why they are live with electrical current. Along with the likes of electric fence posts they are peripheral products which are used to ensure the fencing itself is in good working order.

The idea of electric fence energisers is to secure the perimeter of a field or a property. It is primarily used in the field (excuse the pun) of livestock rearing and is used to keep animals in and out of a designated area. In other words in an agricultural context electric fence energisers are used to keep livestock inside and potentially dangerous intruders such as foxes out. They are also commonly used to prevent wild animals from straying into certain areas such as the main grounds of country estates.

Outside the farming industry they are used to power fencing which secures things such as airport runways (so animals do not stray onto them with potentially disastrous consequences) and important buildings where human intruders need to be deterred. High security prisons for instance often use electric fence energisers to supply energy to live perimeter fence to prevent people from attempting to escape or access the facility from the outside.

There are mains electric fence energisers which can simply be plugged into your electricity supply. Other models generate their own energy â€“ which is often the preferred choice if they are used to power substantial lengths of fencing far away from buildings. These days there are even solar powers electric fence energisers so you can have a renewable energy solution.

Obviously the choice of energiser also depends on the particular application; very small voltage fencing is need for smaller animals such as chickens whereas stronger electric fence energisers are needed for the likes of cows.
