ESources Scam-Unsubstantiated Rumors by Brad Smith

Article published on March 6th 2012 | Business

According to people who use eSources regularly, the question of an eSources scam does not arise simply because eSources leaves no room for scams on its site. While the news of an eSources scam has confused first-time buyers who have never used the site, veterans say that such stories only indicate that competitors of eSources are getting desperate.

Dirty Competition

There is a high likelihood that all stories of an eSources scam have been circulated by people upset with this directory. The more successful eSources becomes, the more its rivals suffer. As most of these competing wholesale sites were hotbeds of scams, when eSources started offering a safe alternative to buyers, the scammers lost customers by the hundreds.

To compensate for their bad images in comparison to eSources, they started spreading rumors of an eSources scam. Now that their strategy has been outed, they are looking for other ways to harm eSources. Not that they are succeeding because eSources scam stories have never been a popular buyer attractionâ€”most of them too smart to fall for such tricks.

Baseless Rumors

Buyers who have used this directory for years say that an eSources scam is impossible because the site has been around for a long time. Plus, the usual indicators of scamâ€”high fees, multiple charges, undisclosed information about suppliers, incomplete product inventoriesâ€”are not present in eSources.

Instead, eSources offers a verified wholesale list and thousands of leads on products at a very modest fee. The suppliers who are featured on eSources are handpicked for their verifiability and experience in the market. Therefore, eSources scam reports are just a way to fool buyers who are realizing the perils of associating with the real scam sites and signing up with eSources to save their businesses.

One reason eSources scam stories are never taken seriously is perhaps the strong credibility the site has even among the suppliers. Many suppliers who refuse to be featured on other wholesale lists request to create profiles on eSources. These are genuine suppliers who are worried about the beating their images will take if they associate with scammers in any way. Naturally, they turn to eSources as a way to find customers without being tainted with scams.

ESources scam reports notwithstanding, buyers are flocking to the site to find suppliers and select merchandise for their stores. ESources scam reports have certainly not deterred even the small retailers, most of whom sell clothing, toys, books, electronics, computers and peripherals, home supplies, jewelry, art, travel equipment, and other products online.

Esources has a fair following among eBayers, who love the many resources they find on this supplier directory. To them, stories of an eSources scam make no sense because they owe the success of their businesses to eSources. Their success speaks loudly in favor of eSources. It also reminds others why the reports of an eSources scam are dying a slow death in the absence of any credibility.
