How to find the Right Executive Coaching Program: Some Tips by James Blee

Article published on June 4th 2012 | Business

Irrespective of the size of an organization, whether it is a multi million dollar corporation, or a tiny business, choosing the right executive coach can be an extremely challenging and difficult decision. The market is packed with such trainers and their training programs. The question is whom to trust and whom not to trust? Well, to begin with, you can ask yourself a set of questions.

In the first place, consider the ROI or return of investment. How much is it going to be? The viability and suitability of the program needs to be considered next. Does the plan actually fit with your professional goals and objectives? The third important question to ask is- is the session tailored to your specific requirements and the needs of your organization or employer?

Apart from these, another important question that needs to be considered is- how do you, as an individual or firm, measure your ROI on what you have actually invested in the tailor made executive coaching program? The question is no doubt critical. This may be accounted to the fact that an organization's strategies and objectives should always be aligned with what they actually plan to get out of any training program or session they invest in.

Even with the above questions in mind, you may have to think of a few important considerations before signing up for an executive coaching program.

It is advisable to start by comparing these training sessions for executives with a half day workshop. A conference or seminar for you and the entire staff held in some other city primarily involves multiple days of traveling on paid leave. An efficient coaching program should be able to eliminate or lower these expenses.

The workshop must drill down to your requirements and the exact needs of each and every individual leader. Moreover, it should also be able to teach them a word or two about making the organization's projects successful. So, you see finding the right executive coach or a training session is not as easy as it sounds. However, with the above considerations in mind, you can always expect to find success.
