Style your Barn with a Cupola by Julia Roger

Article published on January 27th 2012 | Business

The need of air circulation in your home or apartment is catered by air conditioning systems and the modern HVAC system. But in the olden days, such technology never existed. You may have noticed that many barns of the olden days were fitted with a cupolas over the thatched roof. Very efficient and functional even till today, cupolas serve the same purpose of ventilation and light for barns not fitted with air conditioning or have the provision of sufficient lighting.

This architectural structure was used in different styles by Greeks, Romans and the Islamic communities. Not only the cupola adds beauty to the barn but also prevents water from accumulating due to its slanting roof. Constructed from materials like maintenance free vinyl PVC, elegant copper, asphalt shingles or asbestos, these architectural structures prove to be the finest definition of art...

Many types of cupolas are available in market like Ogunquit, Kennebunk, Searsport, Trenton and barn cupolas and each of them has a unique feature and design. This will surely create a dilemma as which one to go for because it is simply impossible to take eyes off another. But before choosing a cupola, it is important to consider some of the basic ideas like the size of the barn and the weight that the roof can bear. Some may need a design architect or a civil engineer in determining this aspect. This architecture can also be constructed at home and this will symbolize oneâ€™s creative skills and a beautiful and sturdy cupola.

If you are planning a renovation of your barn, this is the ideal time to think of a cupola. Station it on the roof shed and give your barn a magnificent external look making the centre of attraction for every passer-by.
