Burglary can threaten not only your precious belongings but also your life and sense of security. Estimates reveal that a burglary happens somewhere every 14.6 seconds in the United States, while the monetary loss per incident averages $1,700 and up. Before you end up losing your valuable possessions and peace of mind, it's best to strengthen your home's defenses.

A lot of homeowners have the misconception that burglars are like ninjas who utilize stealth when breaking into a home. In reality, 34 percent of burglars enter through the front door, while others smash their way through first-floor windows, backdoors, garages, and basements. What's surprising is that even inexperienced burglars spend less than 60 seconds to break into a house. To avoid break-ins, it is wise to consider installing alarm systems.

Burglar alarm systems have become almost a requirement for many businesses, but they are increasingly found in a lot of private homes as well. They work by monitoring forced entry attempts and by triggering the alarm whenever an intruder has successfully broken into the premises. A device then activates whenever a door or window is forcibly opened.

Alarm systems can be installed to react to intruders in different ways. When they are triggered, they can set off loud noises or sirens that may scare off intruders and cause them to flee. An auto-dialer will then notify occupants to alert the police while a signal alerts neighbors or passersby about the incident. In any case, a fully functional burglar alarm system can serve as a major deterrent to break-ins.
