Article published on December 27th 2011 | Computer

Usually computers only have the device drivers that were installed in the computer at the designing period. Once the computer reaches at customerâ€™s end, the device drivers are very rarely updated. Therefore, whenever you wish to connect a new hardware with your computer, if your system lacks the required drivers, the computer fails to connect with the hardware. In addition, if somehow the hardware driver installation is successful, it may overwrite the existing driver and create conflicts among other softwareâ€™s and drivers installed on the computer. Therefore, along with updating the softwareâ€™s, updating device drivers at regular intervals is also very important.

While all the operating systems are prone to compatibility issue, Windows 7 is the most affected one. Windows 7 is designed with a distinct set of device drivers, which do not support all hardwareâ€™s and softwareâ€™s. Due to this, encountering with compatibility issues is more prominent in Windows 7-based computers. Hence, if you are having a computer running on Windows 7, the chances of getting a compatibility issue while installing a hardware device on your computer, is more common.
