John Lock, one of the biggest philosophers of all time delimited the elementary pillars of philosophy in an essay concerning human understanding that is the upshot of the twenty years of the work on the origins of human manners and knowledge. The essay was based on the case that all of our ideas, no matter how straightforward or complex, they are all gained from our experiences.

John Lockeâ€™s contemporaries were all much undisputed in praising an essay concerning human understanding. They all thought that Locke is one of the most excellent philosophers and thinkers of the 17th century.

John Wynne, in 1965, wrote a letter to John Locke which was as below:

"[The] truths contained in our book are so clear and evident, the notions so natural and agreeable to reason, that I imagine none that carefully reads and duly considers them, can avoid being enlightened and instructed by them."

While the 19th century critics kept a keen eye on the 18th century great names, valued their work and underscored their historical grandness in the development of the scientific world. John Wilson also ascribed the Locke essay on pertaining to human understanding with undermining the, â€œabstract, exploratory, and often vague doctrine of the scholastic logicians" along with the foundation of solid scientific values.

in the present day, the thinkers seem to be more intimidated than Lockeâ€™s contemporaries, for example; Vere Chappell said; "[Contemporary philosophy is divided into] logic, epistemology, metaphysics, and moral philosophy, and then, by dissevering these, such specializations as the philosophies of language, science, mind, and religion, ethical theory, and political philosophy. Locke worked enthusiastically in nearly all of these areas."
