Magic the Gathering: the Skill and the Luck by Mark Bernard

Article published on April 6th 2012 | Entertainment

Magic the gathering is one of the most played games in the history of trading card games. They have an astonishing player base of 12 million people all over the world who play and love the game. The game is very addictive due to its tricky and complex rules. The game has been a hit among the card game lovers and has been constant expansion in order to achieve a better and larger game play. The online version of the game is fairly popular on the web and has many online players through servers. The game, just like the other card trading games, is based on a perfect balance of luck and skills. Only luck or only skill is not enough to be victorious in Magic the Gathering. The game, as the name suggest, constructs a virtual or magical world where a battle of wizards takes place in which magical spells and other magical techniques are used to overpower the other rival wizards. The game has organized tournaments and hundreds or prestigious gaming awards to its credit. Many gaming stores conduct small level Magic the Gathering events all the time. However the bigger scale organized tournaments are sponsored and handled by the Wizard of the Coast Company which owns the patent of Magic the Gathering. The gameâ€™s following has been increasing day by day. The game has its loyal customers who love this game as well people who love to play this game during breaks.

The Luck Factor

Luck has been an important factor in Magic the Gathering. Sometimes, the game has received criticism for its more dependence on the luck factor. It has been argued that the game relies more on the luck and the employment of skills takes backseat. Magic the Gathering has been banned in few countries who believe that the game is based on chance and is comparable to gambling. However, being a trading card game, one cannot criticise the game solely on the point that it requires luck. The game has been a source of constant thrill to the players and also depends on the gaming and strategic skills of the players. Magic the gathering has been a magical game for the card lovers all across the globe.

The Required Skills

One must remember that one cannot win solely based on luck every time. And when it comes to card games, skills are very important in the determination of the winner. The winner of any card game must have some basic but polished skills related to the game. One wrong move can let yopu down in the game. A game can only be won or played when you have at least some basic skills. You must understand and master the use of spells, magical creatures and items to become a winner in Magic the Gathering. You must develop the art of reading the playing pattern of your opponent. Skills combined with a bit of good luck can make you the clear winner in the Magic the Gathering.
