How Different is High Risk Merchant Processing by Angie Turner

Article published on June 22nd 2012 | Finance

There are some businesses that are special. But that specialty can bring lots more expense for them. Every business needs a current account through which transactions are made, may it be payments or income. But general accounts are not offered to the businesses which are prone to fraud in terms of payment made to them. Most of the businesses are based on web and they operate in high risk zone and they are offered high risk merchant account. These businesses include travel and tourism, gambling, adult video, pharmaceuticals, and many more.

Now the question is why the risk is high in all these cases. In case of online payment both credit and debit cards are accepted. Once the person makes the payment he is given some facilities and access. But it is possible for the person to revert the payment by cancelling order or it can come up as a fraud case of payment using someone else's credit card. In such cases the bank is at a risk of paying the money because the merchant may have already withdrawn the amount. So every bank will not offer high risk merchant processing and you need a separate account for the same too.

In most of the cases the high risk merchant accounts are costly for the person owning it. There are lots of rules and regulations that the person needs to abide by. The person can only withdraw one part of the money. 10% to 20% money is kept as reserve from all the transactions made which can be withdrawn once 90 or 120 days are passed from the date when the payment was made. This is a security method which ensures that the bank does not lose much even if it is a fraud payment.
