Everybody possesses beauty defects that many think as embarrassing to tolerate or are just undesirable. A huge nose, thick eyebrows, a short chin or a thin mouth are cases of these imperfections. Whatever it is, this imperfection affects us to no end and no degree of persuation that it is not even recognizable will change our mind set. We continue to look at them as flaws and we will accomplish whatever it requires to make them right. Correcting it will make us feel good and appear good to others.

This can be a bit challenging though because what society sees as beautiful keeps continues to evolve. A couple of hundred years ago, an overweight build was thought to be attractive since it spelled wealth. Sadly, this example of what society considers attractive became thinner, and went from pasty-white to tanned, and back. All these adjustments has puzzled many individuals specifically those who intend to keep up with societyâ€™s standards.
