There are so many times, when living in a big city, that we feel as though we are being treated like animals, and that is usually a bad thing; so, when is it that being treated like an animal would actually be a good thing? It's when you know that your pet is being treated in a manner that you would be expecting if you were in some of the top hospitals, that a city like New York has to offer.

Of course, actually finding a place that will care for your pets like that is going to be difficult, even in New York. What do you do to find the best care for your pet? To start with, it all depends when you are looking. OK, that may sound odd at first glance, but, think about it for a moment. If it is late at night, and your pet is suddenly taken ill, do you have time to properly research every veterinary clinic New York has? I'm not sure about you, but most people would be in a panic, and looking to get their pet to the nearest clinic that they could.

If that were the case, then the phonebook would possibly be the only research tool that you would use, but, if you were planning ahead for a worst case scenario, then there are a few other things that you should do before settling on the clinic that you will turn to in your pet's hour of need.

When it comes to the veterinary clinic, New York has some of the best around, but it pays to check with family and friends as to which they would recommend. Failing that, check online to see what other people are saying about the clinics in your area. Or, if you are having problems doing either of those, here's a clue: Westchester Veterinarians.

In Croton-on-Hudson there is a clinic that has everything that you and your pet could ever need - when it comes to their health and wellbeing. They have been helping the pets in the area (and surrounding areas) since 1973, and are very well respected, not only in the local community, but in the profession, too. They are one of only around 14% of clinics in the country to hold an AAHA (American Animal Hospital Association) accreditation, and have done so since 1974.

When it comes to the facilities, and skills of these Westchester veterinarians, your pet could hardly be in better hands, even if it were to be taken to a private ward in your local hospital. Sound like a slight exaggeration? Well, they are equipped to handle: Dental Care, Digital Dental Radiology, and Surgery; Immunizations; Surgery and Orthopedics; Avian and Exotics Medicine; Ultrasound; Small Animal Medicine; Nutrition Counselling; and much more besides.

If there is anything that the on-site specialist isn't able to deal with, they can refer you directly to a specialist who will be able to help with your pet's illness or complaint.
