Stone Paving for a Remarkable-Looking Home by Stone Seller

Article published on August 20th 2012 | Home Improvement

The rough and earthy appeal of stone paving is very charming, which accounts for its popularity among homeowners and designers of commercial buildings. Whether stone paving is done for patios, driveways and walkways, it transforms an environment giving it not only beauty but also a lot of warmth and character.

What Are The Materials Used For Stone Paving?

Are up for a do-it-yourself stone paving at home?  Before you begin, consider the following materials: sandstone, slate and bluestone. These are some of the most commonly used materials for stone paving each with their own strengths and weaknesses.

Sandstone for example is durable and tough against harsh environments but it is not exactly the most water-resistant material. Good and occassional sealing of the stone paving is necessary. Slate meanwhile is a great building material but it is rather costly. Bluestone is very hardwearing but unfortunately it is also porous. This type of stone also requires sealing.

Do plenty of research about all your options for stone paving materials before making a decision and making that bulk purchase from trusted natural stone supplier.

Can You Do Stone Paving Yourself?

Are you excited about beginning your home improvement project and considering doing it yourself? Be warned though that while DYI is possible, it is a tremendous challenge. You might be going over online instructions and DYI videos thinking that the task seems quite simple enough but the truth is Stone Paving requires imagination, meticulousness and a lot of hard manual labor.

Creativity and imagination are important. Stone paving can be beautifully designed with a mix of materials but it is also easy to go wrong. So many homeowners have dabbled with designing mosaic-like stone paving only to find that it doesnâ€™t quite look how they imagined it.

Meticulousness is also integral to the Natural Stone Paving task. The area should be properly measured, marked and leveled. The edges should be neatly done with the rest of the tiles correctly centered. Those with professional experience and a lot of practice make home improvement projects like this seem easy but the truth is laying the tiles on sand is very tiring and requires a great deal of care.

Do- it yourself stone paving is not impossible but getting professional help from a contractor or hardscaping expert is still best.

Stone paving, how ever you choose to do it, boast of many advantages though. Stone is durable, great for the outdoors and â€“if done rightâ€“very beautiful.
