Basement windows represent the Catch-22 of every home. You need to ventilate the basement because if you don't, mold and other things might start growing and could undermine the integrity of your home's foundation. On the other hand, if you install a window to ventilate your basement, it might increase the risk of burglary.

That is the dilemma homeowners frequently face. Windows at ground level are very obvious targets for some of the darker elements of society, and most windows with glass panes are easily broken with a sharp kick or a baseball bat. Fortunately for homeowners everywhere, window experts recognize this problem and continuously develop ways to make basement windows safer and still be able to provide basic functions like aesthetic appeal, insulation, and ventilation. The fruits of their labors are several innovative and exceptionally secure window options that can be installed on your basement walls.

Some of the best windows for your basement don't have to be very complicated systems with alarm bells or whatnot. For instance, one of the most popular types is the common jalousie window. Because this type is made up of several panes of glass, this could be discouraging to burglars since they have to either break all the glass slats or remove them by hand one by one.

Glass block basement windows are also found in a lot of Midland households. For those who don't know, glass block windows look like a grid of glass blocks that are either clear or frosted. To get in, the intruder would have to break all the glass blocks as well as make a big enough entry in the grid to get in.

Frosted glass is another window variety you can install on your basement. Though they may seem flimsy, frosted glass windows Midland households use are in fact paired with security bars. This provides a sense of style, as well as impenetrable security.

Perhaps the type that is best known for its security capabilities is the wire mesh window. Wire mesh windows Midland households use typically have two panes of glass, frosted or clear, with a thick security mesh in between. Even if burglars manage to break the first pane, they still have to go through the mesh and subsequent panes.

Whatever kind of basement window you choose, make sure to only work with trustworthy contractors that sell quality Midland windows.
