After crunching the numbers, you've finally estimated the total cost to replace your old windows. However, when the actual bill comes after being replaced, you suddenly grow surprised at how your estimates are way off. It's either you forgot to carry over (a frequent mistake in math) or the fact that there are costs your old windows didn't want you to see.

Hidden costs can catch you off-guard if you don't check the health of your old windows. Dry rot, mold, and other window problems do so well in hide-and-seek that you can't see them until the day of the replacement. Experts define at least four hidden costs to look out for when estimating the total cost of window replacement. If you're not careful, you can end up paying more.

Size: The size of the window opening may be too big or too small for new windows to fit when the old ones are taken out. When that happens, the contractor will have to reframe the window to fit, adding up to the cost you've already estimated. It's important that the windows fit so you can get the most out of its heating and cooling properties.

Mold: Moisture problems in the opening can promote the growth of mold, further adding up to the cost. For the record, you have to call a mold remediation service first before the installation of windows can start. Regular inspections will avoid these problems from starting in the first place, which should've saved you money.

Dry rot: If your old window frame is natural wood, dry rot may add up to the overhead cost of window replacement. Dry rot pertains to the decaying of wood as a result of a species of fungi, causing the integrity of the wooden structure to deteriorate. Modern replacement windows NJ contractors offer are usually protected against ample amounts of moisture and other problems. However, too much of a bad thing can render even the most energy-efficient window useless.

Pests: Termites and other pests can wreak havoc on your old windows NJ old homes may still have and also the opening itself. They may have created a network of tunnels under your old windows, creating an entry point to the house from the colony. Clearing the pests and repairing the damage will definitely add up to the total cost.
