Low-Tech Ways to Make Your Home Safe by John Cherry

If you own a house, you deserve the right to relax in it and not worry about break-ins, home invasions or other security issues. However, in this day and age, you must at least spend some of your time considering how to make your house more secure. Your thoughts might instantly turn to the installation of a home security system, since they have been proven to significantly deter crime. While getting a home security system installed in your home is an excellent idea, it by no means is the only step you can take to secure your home. In fact, there are many low-tech options you can choose when it comes to basic home security.

First, always keep your doors and windows locked. This might seem way too basic of a tip; however, the majority of burglaries occur because someone in the home left a door unlocked or a window open. Donâ€™t provide these kinds of opportunities to would-be thieves. Just make sure your doors and windows are locked at all times and your odds of getting robbed go way down.

Install exterior lighting around the perimeter of your house. Criminals like dark yards because they allow them excellent cover. They will choose dark yards over ones that are lighted just about every time. Attention is the enemy of thieves and light provides attention. Burglars will go to great lengths to avoid detection, which means they will skip your lighted house and move on to one that provides more places to hide. In the event that a burglar does try to break into your house even with the security lighting, odds are better that one of your neighbors will see him, which is another reason why lighting is a great home security component.

If you have a garage, be sure to keep your garage door closed and locked whenever you are not using it. For some reason, people seem to forget about their garage when it comes to home security, but garages can provide an easy entry point to your house. In addition, thieves can steal a lot of valuable items from the garage, including your vehicle. Moreover, criminals can enter the garage and lie in wait for someone to enter it. This provides them with an easy target, but it doesnâ€™t have to be that way. Simply close and lock your garage door and you are already safer.

These are just some of the low-tech suggestions for homeowners who want to boost their home security. There are many more, but just by executing the tips in this article, you will significantly improve your familyâ€™s safety.
