Using the right method to paint the interiors of your home can make a huge difference to the overall appearance of your home. Using the wrong method will not only be a waste of money and effort put in to buying the paint color and applying it, it will also appear highly unprofessional. There are 3 basic methods to painting the wall: spray paints, brush or roller. By knowing how these techniques function, you are in a better position to choosing the right method for coloring your homeâ€™s interiors.

Spray Paints

Spray paints are ideal for coloring large areas. They enable you to paint quickly and evenly with minimal efforts. The color can easily cover every part of the surface even if it is jagged. This can be difficult when using a brush or a roller; you cannot reach into the crevices in the surface using brushes or rollers. Air spray always gives a clean finish. Simultaneously, the spray paint method can be somewhat challenging for an amateur painter. Using spray to apply paint color is not as simple as it looks for a beginner. Spray painting can easily leave blobs of paint over your possessions. You will be required to cover all your belongings prior to spray painting to avoid the spraying color from blotching them. Additionally, spray paints are expensive compared to rollers and brushes. It is recommended that only an expert painter handles them to give a clean finish.

Rollers and Brushes

While paint rollers and brushes require more effort in applying paint color, you donâ€™t need to prepare much before beginning the paint job. They are less likely to leave blobs on your goods. However, they do tend to leave thick residue of paint on the surface, making a difficult technique to work with. The paint tends to overlap when using these tools, resulting in uneven coats of color. For an expert painter, however, using this technique is never a problem.

Traditional Painting Method for Interiors

Despite the downside of using paint brushes and rollers, experts propose their use over spray paints for interior coloring for do-it-yourself painting. This is because unless you are a professional painter, you will face more challenges using the spraying method. You may experience spillage and blockage when using air spray. Moreover, when painting inside a closed environment, such as the inside of the room, you are more prone to inhaling the toxic fumes as well as paint mist from the spray paints. This is harmful to your health.

As an amateur painter, it is advisable for you to stick to the conventional technique of using rollers and brushes with painting the inside of your house. Sprayers can be kept for exterior painting jobs as they do not pose much threat to health and to your belongings.
