Learning Chinese Mandarin in China by Maureen Hayes

Article published on June 18th 2012 | Language

China has outdone itself by becoming a recognized force on the international scene. Many nations and organizations have as a consequence widely accepted China's influence and close ties are being fostered every passing day. These events have seen the Chinese language, also known as Mandarin, become widely accepted as a major international language and accordingly, many people are interested in learning Mandarin.

It is said that the best way to learn a new language is to be among people who speak it as a native language. As such, learning Chinese Mandarin is definitely best done in China. There are several Chinese language schools in China including language academies and public universities which offer these courses and therefore what remains is choosing one that best addresses your learning Chinese needs.

The best way to obtain information on Chinese language schools is through placement programs; there is a program that is just right for you for whatever degree of proficiency you desire in learning Mandarin. There are programs to help with pronunciation and word usage and others for speaking, reading and writing. Learning Chinese Mandarin in China also gives you the opportunity to blend with the natives and learn their cultures. This is known to be particularly helpful for effectively grasping the different phonics and tones Mandarin entails.

Chinese language schools mainly offer a choice of two programs i.e. the summer learning Mandarin program which runs for about three months and the long term program which takes up to twenty weeks. The latter program is offered by universities in terms of semesters and hence admission is only available at preset dates. Academies are however more flexible with regards to offering programs which the student can start off at any point in time. Further, there are two options for learning Chinese Mandarin in China language schools; one option is referred to as regular class were you study Monday thru Friday 4 hours a day, and the other is referred to as intensive class where you not only study Monday thru Friday 4 hours a day but also study with a tutor 2 hours a day.

Placement programs have taken time to consolidate information from the so many different China institutions offering learning Chinese Mandarin programs. Other than providing information on the most befitting Chinese language schools to enroll in, these placement programs also organize travel plans including assistance with visa, accommodation, fees, medical insurance, orientation, and even internship and job placements. These organizations also organize for tuition after classes i.e. for assistance with homework and extra learning, they further arrange for tours in China, and their offices or headquarters provide a refuge where students can solicit for assistance while in China. The whole objective of these placement programs is to make learning Mandarin in China a smooth and unique learning experience that is also value for your money.
