Asbestos is a mineral that was once commonly used as a building material during the 1970s due to its durability and high resistance to heat. However, in more recent years the use of asbestos as building material has been heavily restricted in the United States. It has in banned in many countries because it was discovered that exposure to asbestos causes cancers like mesothelioma, but not in the U.S. Nevertheless, despite the known health issues many manufacturers continue to use asbestos and people are still unwittingly being exposed. Those who were exposed to this material often do not know until they have been diagnosed with mesothelioma or another asbestos cancer.

Asbestos is still a major health threat. Despite advances in industrial and construction technology, asbestos remains a very important material in many industries. Generally people who work in asbestos mines are exposed to asbestos. The same goes with people who work in any asbestos processing plant. However, exposure to asbestos is not limited to these industries. Those who work in car industries and other industries, even the military, can be exposed to asbestos. Individuals and families may be exposed to asbestos if they live near such mines. Workers who renovate old homes that used materials with asbestos are at great risk. Most people simply do not know that they have been exposed until it is too late.

For those who have been exposed to asbestos and have been diagnosed with mesothelioma, the best course of action is to contact mesothelioma attorneys from a law firm like Baron and Budd. The use of asbestos translates to millions of dollars in profit and companies are experts in mesothelioma cases.
