Facebook marketing prospects are coming to a complicated way as the premier social media site has been facing surveillance in India for its users' content defamation. Most of the companies that are using Facebook for their marketing prospects are now in different direction in search of a point for their businesses. Sales solutions of these companies are affecting a lot. However, Facebook new steps for its content defamation may focus a new phase in the sales solutions as it been expected.

A computer engineer and self-proclaimed hacker, the 58-year-old Dr Stallman said with regard to Facebook and their prospective business orientation and the ways of deleting obligatory content from the site, "I don't care about that. Facebook mistreats its users. Facebook is not your friend, it is a surveillance engine. For instance, if you browse the Web and you see a 'like' button in some page or some other site that has been displayed from Facebook. Therefore, Facebook knows that your machine visited that page. So, Facebook carries out surveillance over visitors to thousands of different Websites, even for people who are not Facebook users. I hope we will have something for free browsers to block Facebook 'like' buttons so that people won't be under surveillance. In any case, this is why I ask people not to put photographs of me on Facebook, because Facebook collects data about the names of people in photos. It might as well be working directly for Big Brother."

Dr Stallman further said, "I think there are three major ISPs that are the only ones that most Americans can use. As a result, those three together could shut down almost all the Internet if they want. The further step from three companies controlling most people's access to one company controlling all is a substantial step but most of the way has gone already. The philosophy of free software is competing with the big proprietary software firms, who can spend a lot. It's actually the free software itself that opposes them. Competing is too weak a word. This is not a competition for success at all."

He further said, "I heard that India has a national population registry which is taking lot of biometrics of people. People in India should organise to fight against and resist the national population registry as well as the ID number. I'm not surprised. What else do you expect governments to do? Governments want total control over people. If you say I want freedom but if it's inconvenient for me to keep it I will give it up, then you are weak. That means all that the businesses that are working together have to do is set up a situation where you encounter an inconvenience in maintaining your freedom and you give it up."
