Insane Home Office Set-ups by A2b Office

Article published on January 21st 2012 | Shopping

For most people, buying a new computer monitor happens every couple of years and the home office consists of that very monitor (19â€³ if youâ€™re lucky) sitting precariously on top of a desk by the name of SkÃ¤g, bought for Â£5 from Ikea.

Of course there are people who take home office setups far more seriously, a few of which weâ€™ll now show you. Just imagine the cable mayhemâ€¦

Stefan Didak has possibly the most famous setup on the internet. There are a total of 12 monitors in his home office, 6 of which (all 24?) form the central workspace, and just laying and organising all the systemsâ€™ cables took him 4 days. Of course, being the geek he is, all the separate systems have names (e.g. Xenon, Nitrous, Hydrogen) and combined provide storage space to the tune of 102TB. Visit his site here for comprehensive details of his incredible setup and more photographs to drool over.

Including his laptop and 2 screens currently kept in the closet, Mitch Haileâ€™s home office boasts 11 monitors, 6 of which are lined up together and connected to his MacPro with 3 ATI 2600 video cards. For answers to the most common questions asked of him, visit Mitchâ€™s website here, a page of which is dedicated to the setup. He even discusses the furniture beneath the technology, including a surprisingly modest chair bought from Staples.

Flickr user coyote.land posted these pictures of his 9 system setup (Five Macs, three PCs and a Linux box) back in May. He says the home-based setup, when used for web development, is â€˜11,600 horizontal pixels of heavenâ€™. See the photo on Flickr.

Honorable mention must also go to the following 3 setups, all found on Realtime Softâ€™s website. Information about them is scarce but the amount of monitors warranted their inclusionâ€¦
