Paid and free are the two software versions usually offered in the market. Even if a free software is restricted to a few functions, it can truly be a a godsend for many people. To step up to more advanced features, you have to pay for the update.

The Blackberry Enterprise Server is no different; it has the Express as its free version and the v5.0 as the paid one. The comparison of the Express and the v5.0 has been the subject of debate in online forums and other sites. Should you go for the money saver or the full-course plate? Some professionals have provided their own thoughts on which one to choose.

Both the Express and the v5.0 call for the use of a client license (CAL) to get activated and uncover its clever functions. CALs also appear in other software, typically named license keys, to make certain that the software copy is genuine. One CAL for the BlackBerry Enterprise Server is adequate for several units-though the v5.0's CAL can provide for more.

The Express includes five or ten CALs, with each CAL good for 75 units if they are all using the same server. Differently, the v5.0 has 20 CALs, with each CAL good for a mighty 2,000 units. To acquire more CALs for more units, you can get Express CALs for free, while a single v5.0 CAL can cost you about $90.00.

As discussed previously, if you wish to get more from your software, it will definitely cost you several dollars. For less than $3,000, you can get the Blackberry Enterprise Server v5.0 with added functions and full technical support. The cost may seem too expensive to pay for, but if you operate a big business, you need a full arsenal of functions to sustain it. Having said that, the Express can be a better option for medium- and small-sized businesses.

You can manage the Blackberry Enterprise Server 5 to behave in a manner suitable for your company. This can be done by configuring the appropriate IT policies, which are applicable for the Express and the v5.0. The Express has 35 IT policies available, while the v5.0 offers 450 IT policies.
