As the term suggests, artist stretcher bars are actually used by artists for their art and their main purpose is to hold the canvas in position as they progress with their work. They can even be used later for presenting their art in front of the audience. With the rise in museum and galleries all over the world, the demand for such bars has further increased. Many companies have joined the business of providing stretcher bars at reasonable price and so the customer gets more flexible options in terms of their quality and price.

The artists use the bars by arranging them to form stretcher frames of the required shape and size so that they can tightly mount their canvas. Such frames are perfect for supporting all forms of art, starting from oil painting to embroidery and needle work. They can even keep the artwork safe for longer periods. They are attached to the frames with the help of staples.

Ways to fit Artist Stretcher Bars:

A skilled hand is required to fit the artist stretcher bars although the process may sound very simple. Four stretcher bars are placed adjacent to each other to form the frame of the required shape and size. The artists do not fix the bars permanently so that they can use them later for different artwork. The bars are generally made up of high quality wood to ensure that the artwork is not spoiled. Another reason for not fixing the corner of the canvas stretcher frames in a permanent manner is that the wood used to make the framing stretcher might expand or contract due to exposure to moisture.

Stretcher Bars: Now you can get them Online:

The artist stretcher bars are generally made up of high quality such as pine or fir. They are very light so that the artwork does not become too heavy. With the coming of the internet, it has now become very easy to order stretcher bars online as many reputed retail outlets maintain their own websites. Stretcher frames can be of different sizes according to the requirement of an artist.
